THE DEAD SEA AND ENVIRONS. /F course, we visited the Dead Sea: all do. And how fortunate it is that the best account of it leaves for the last comer still all the freshness of the event! A book is good in its way, at one's fireside; and we had all seen the long descent to that terrible Lake through the help of many a clever one. Yet when we bestrode our horses, dashed along the unfenced plain, gave our last look at Absalom's tomb (which was not his), and, on the slope leading to the valley of Jehoshaphat, saw hundreds of white-robed women who rose like spectres from the ground to look at us,--we wafted a last farewell for the time to those long walls which, like the lids of a Bible, shut in so much of God and man, till the crest of the hill rose as a barrier, and we saw Jerusalem no more. There on the left was little Bethany, its handful of houses enlarged in vision to the proportions of a heavenly city, and so we went on and down by a road which we knew could not continue so good for ever. And like ships at sea, which signal, but do not speak, we silently passed groups of merchants and pilgrims. The pilgrims to Jerusalem would make a study by themselves. We ourselves were pilgrims. There they were, from all nations; for the Moslem considers his sacred sanctuary there as second only to that of Mecca. I am not sure that even he does not consider Jerusalem the sacreder city of the two. But the most numerous were the Russians. There was something new in the pathos their faces inspired. We had not before seen that look from a Christian, a double look of earthly and celestial humility. Pinched and sodden as his face often was with the cold comfort of the north, his doglike fidelity to what he thought he believed was still better to behold than any face of th...
